QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Did Congress, in passing the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, intend to leave litigants without any judicial forum in which to pursue constitutional claims against the Immigration and Naturalization Service, even if those claims do not challenge the merits of any decisions made by the INS, but only the procedures used in making those decisions, and even if they do not involve challenges to the three discrete decisions protected by the language of the statute?

2. If Congress did so intend, does it have the constitutional power to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over constitutional claims where no alternative federal forum is available?

PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDING

In addition to the parties named in the caption, Brian Perryman, the Chicago District Director of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, was a party to the case before the Court of Appeals.

PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

Petitioners, Emil Botezatu and his wife Gabriela Botezatu (collectively "Petitioners"), respectfully request that a writ of certiorari be issued to review the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in this case.

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit is reported at 195 F.3d 311 (CA7 1999) (App. A). The decision denying rehearing en banc, Botezatu v. INS, No. 98-4155 (7th Cir., Jan. 5, 2000) is unpublished and included in the appendix herein (App. B). The opinion of the district court in Botezatu v. INS, case no. 98cv01965 (N.D. IL., Oct. 21, 1998) (Lindberg, J.) is not published, but is included in the appendix herein (App. C).

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit was entered on October 21, 1999. The Court of Appeals denied a timely petition for rehearing on January 5, 2000.

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28

U.S.C. §1254(1).

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

Article I, §9 of the United States Constitution provides in relevant part:
"The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public safety may require it."

28 U.S.C. §2241(a) provides in relevant part:
"Writs of habeas corpus may be granted by the Supreme Court, any justice thereof, the district courts and any circuit judge within their respective jurisdictions."

28 U.S.C. §1331 provides that "The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States."

Section 242(g) of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, 8 U.S.C. §1252(g), provides: "Except as provided in this section and notwithstanding any other provision of law, no court shall have jurisdiction to hear any cause or claim by or on behalf of any alien arising from the decision or action by the Attorney General to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders against any alien under this Act."

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The fundamental question in this case is whether, in passing the immigration statute codified at 8 U.S.C. §1252(g), which covers decisions by the Attorney General to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders against any alien, Congress intended to foreclose judicial review of procedural due process and other constitutional claims brought against the Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS").

In this case, Petitioners, a married couple, applied for post-deportation relief and were denied such relief without a hearing. They alleged that this and other procedural irregularities violated their rights to procedural due process. Mrs. Botezatu, a Romanian national, has been granted political asylum in the United States by the INS, meaning that she has a well-founded fear of persecution should she return to Romania. She is now a permanent resident of the United States, and she has applied for citizenship. The INS seeks to deport Mr. Botezatu, who has no criminal record at all, poses no danger to the community, and is a productive member of society, because he overstayed his tourist visa while claiming asylum. Petitioners sought post-deportation relief so that they could stay together in this country, which was especially critical for them given Mrs. Botezatu's inability to return to Romania. To fully appreciate the significance of the issues presented by this case, it is essential to consider its factual background and the specific claims made by Petitioners.

A. Factual Background

Petitioners Emil and Gabriela Botezatu were born in Romania. They first met in 1988 and soon started living together. Petitioners have lived together continuously for nearly twelve years.

Petitioners experienced political problems in Romania after they participated in demonstrations against Nicolae Ceausescu and his successor Ion Iliescu, and in 1993 they sought asylum in the United States. On March 19, 1993, they filed separate, nearly identical, applications for political asylum. (They were mistakenly advised by the person who assisted them with their asylum applications that they should not get married prior to seeking asylum.) Mrs. Botezatu was granted asylum. Mr. Botezatu's asylum application was denied by an immigration judge, and he appealed that decision to the Board of Immigration Appeals ("BIA"). During this appeal, Petitioners were legally married, and Mrs. Botezatu, by then a lawful permanent resident of the United States, applied for permanent residence for Mr. Botezatu. This application was approved, but there were no visa numbers available for Mr. Botezatu to immigrate. (App. D ¶¶ 9-16.)

The BIA denied Mr. Botezatu's asylum claim, and he appealed that decision to the Seventh Circuit in 1996. On April 7, 1997, the Seventh Circuit dismissed Mr. Botezatu's asylum appeal. Thereafter, the INS issued a "bag and baggage" letter demanding that Mr. Botezatu report for deportation to Romania.

Petitioners sought to remain in the United States together. Accordingly, they sought several post-deportation remedies. First, on May 1, 1997, Petitioners filed for reinstatement of Mr. Botezatu's voluntary departure so that he could leave the United States without the stigma of deportation and later re-enter the country to be with Mrs. Botezatu when his visa number allowed him to immigrate.[1] The reinstatement application was denied on June 6, 1997 (App. E). Petitioners' Complaint in this case alleges that the Chicago District Office of the INS uses its power to rule on applications for extensions and reinstatements of voluntary departure as a means of discouraging asylum applicants from pursuing appeals, penalizing those who do choose to appeal to the Seventh Circuit because they are viewed as "su[ing] the INS".

[1]One who is deported -- even if married to a United States citizen -- must normally wait ten years before re-entering this country. See 8 U.S.C. §1182(a)(9)(A)(ii).

After reinstatement of voluntary departure was denied, Petitioners' attorney called a deportation officer to discuss other possible remedies so as to enable Mr. Botezatu to continue living with Mrs. Botezatu or to rejoin her as soon as a visa number became available for him. Before any substantive conversation could take place, the officer, admitting he was thoroughly unfamiliar with the case, stated that any request for a stay of deportation would be denied out of hand, and that he was under a directive to deny all stay requests unless they involved serious medical reasons. Moreover, the officer requested that counsel not file a stay application simply because this would require him to respond in writing, requiring extra work. Petitioners' Complaint in this case alleges that within the past two or three years, the Chicago District office of the INS has adopted a policy of "front-desking" stay applications, automatically denying requests for stays of deportation without giving them any consideration whatsoever unless they are based on serious medical reasons. Family unity factors, though traditionally considered important, are no longer given any consideration (App. D ¶¶ 23-25).

On July 9, 1997, Petitioners filed an application for humanitarian parole, or alternatively for deferred action, which was subsequently denied (App. F). They then applied for a stay of deportation. On March 11, 1998, the INS denied the application for a stay of deportation (App. G). The INS decided all of the foregoing applications for post-deportation relief without a hearing.

B. Proceedings Below

On March 31, 1998, Petitioners filed the instant complaint in federal district court, alleging, inter alia, that the methods the INS used in denying their various applications violated procedural due process in that: (1) the decisions were made by a non-attorney who did not conduct any hearing at all despite the important rights involved; (2) the INS pre-judged the merits of their applications, and of others seeking similar relief, before they were even submitted; and (3) the INS gave directives to its officers that eliminated family unity considerations as a factor in deciding which people can remain in this country despite a deportation order (App. D).

Petitioners also alleged substantive due process violations, i.e, that Respondents' failure to allow this married couple, who have lived together for almost twelve years, to stay together is a violation of their rights of marital privacy. Additionally, they alleged various violations of treaties to which the United States is a signatory, as well as violations of customary international law, which protect the right of marriage. Finally, Petitioners alleged that the INS has engaged in a pattern of misusing the voluntary departure remedy to dissuade asylum seekers from exercising their right to appeal.

The INS moved to dismiss the case, and the District Court granted its motion, holding that it had no jurisdiction over the foregoing claims (App. C). The case was then appealed to the Seventh Circuit, which affirmed (App. A). A timely Petition for Rehearing En Banc was denied on January 5, 2000 (App. B).

C. Basis for Federal Jurisdiction in First Instance

Petitioners contend that there is no evidence that, in passing 8 U.S.C. §1252(g), Congress intended to foreclose jurisdiction over constitutional claims, specifically the claims of widespread procedural irregularities alleged in their complaint. Therefore, since §1252(g) does not apply to such claims, the federal courts have jurisdiction over this case under 28 U.S.C. §2241 (the habeas statute), 28 U.S.C. §1331, and the Suspension Clause of the Constitution (Art. I, §9).

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE PETITION

Certiorari should be granted in this case for three reasons. First, the decision below conflicts with the law in the great majority of circuits on the important issue of the extent to which federal courts still have jurisdiction to entertain habeas petitions raising constitutional claims in light of Congress' recent immigration reforms. Second, the Seventh Circuit's decision effectively -- and unnecessarily -- raises the serious constitutional question whether Congress has the power to strip federal courts of their jurisdiction over constitutional issues. Third, this Court's review would provide much-needed clarity on recurring issues of fundamental importance to immigration law.

I. THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT'S DETERMINATION THAT THE "EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION" PROVISION OF THE ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION REFORM AND IMMIGRANT RESPONSIBILITY ACT OF 1996 PRECLUDES JUDICIAL REVIEW OF HABEAS CORPUS PETITIONS ALLEGING DUE PROCESS VIOLATIONS CONFLICTS WITH THE GREAT MAJORITY OF FEDERAL CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS.

In the decision below, the Seventh Circuit held that Petitioners' procedural due process claims were subject to the jurisdiction-stripping provisions of §242(g) of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, 110 Stat. 3009-546 ("IIRIRA"), codified as 8 U.S.C. §1252(g) (Supp. 1998) ("§1252(g)"), because they amounted to a direct challenge to the merits of a deportation order and thereby impermissibly intruded on the Attorney General's "'no deferred action' decisions and similar discretionary determinations." Botezatu v. INS, 195 F.3d 311, 313-14 (CA7 1999) (quoting Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 525 U.S. 471, 485 (1999) ("AADC")) (App. A). This holding directly conflicts with the decisions of nine other Courts of Appeals.[2]

[2]See Wallace v. Reno, 194 F.3d 279, 285 (CA1 1999) (noting that "[t]he Supreme Court's surprisingly narrow reading of [§1252(g)] . . . certainly does not encourage us to enlarge the reach of that section" and concluding that the federal courts may entertain habeas petitions challenging the constitutionality of final orders of deportation); DeSousa v. Reno, 190 F.3d 175, 182-83 (CA3 1999) (holding that §1252(g) "only applies to suits challenging the government's selective enforcement of the immigration laws"); Selgeka v. Carroll, 184 F.3d 337, 341 (CA4 1999) (concluding that §1252(g) did not apply to a due process claim challenging the refusal to permit petitioner to present his application to an immigration judge in a deportation hearing); Stewart v. INS, 181 F.3d 587, 594 (CA4 1999) (ruling that habeas jurisdiction was available there because "a motion to reopen is very similar to a motion to reconsider" and AADC specifically excluded motions to reconsider from §1252(g)'s scope); Requena-Rodriguez v. Reno, 190 F.3d 299, 303 (CA5 1999) (holding that district courts have jurisdiction to hear habeas petitions that challenge a final order of deportation because such a challenge does not fall under one of the three discrete actions listed in §1252(g)); Zhislin v. Reno, 195 F.3d 810, 813 (CA6 1999) (concluding that due process claims are subject to judicial review if they arise from deportation proceedings so long as they do not directly challenge the three discrete events listed in §1252(g)); Mustata v. U.S. Dep't of Justice, 179 F.3d 1017, 1023 (CA6 1999) (ruling that §1252(g) did not strip the district court of jurisdiction over the petitioners' habeas claim that ineffective assistance of counsel at their deportation hearings violated due process); Shah v. Reno, 184 F.3d 719, 722 (CA8 1999) (noting that "[t]he words 'commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders' refer to separate and discrete actions in the deportation process" and, consequently, §1252(g) "has nothing to do" with cases where "review is sought of a final order of deportation"); Barahona-Gomez v. Reno, 167 F.3d 1228, 1234 (CA9 1999) (holding that §1252(g) does not preclude jurisdiction over due process claims); Walters v. Reno, 145 F.3d 1032, 1052 (CA9 1998), cert. denied, 526 U.S. 1003 (1999) (ruling that the federal courts had jurisdiction over due process claims challenging the adequacy of the notice a class of aliens received concerning their possible deportation for document fraud); Jurado-Gutierrez v. Greene, --- F.3d --- (CA10 1999) (1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 30711, at *13) (holding that a final order of deportation remains reviewable on habeas because it does "not interfere with the Attorney General's decision to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute a removal order"); Richardson v. Reno, 180 F.3d 1311, 1312 (CA11 1999), rehearing en banc denied, 193 F.3d 525 (CA11 1999) (holding that a habeas petition challenging the constitutionality of petitioners' removal from the United States or their detention while awaiting removal is not barred by §1252(g)); Tefel v. Reno, 180 F.3d 1286, 1298 (CA11 1999), rehearing en banc denied, 198 F.3d 265 (CA11 1999) (concluding that "constitutional challenges to legislation specifically mandating [a certain] application of the stop-time rule" are not barred by §1252(g)); Mayers v. Reno, 175 F.3d 1289, 1297 (CA11 1999) (holding that final orders of deportation are reviewable because §1252(g) excludes from judicial review only three discrete decisions or actions of the Attorney General). See also Garcia-Guzman v. Reno, 65 F. Supp. 2d 1077, 1083 (N.D. Cal. 1999) (concluding that petitioner's claim was cognizable on habeas because he "is not claiming that the INS should have granted him 'deferred action' before adjudicating his case -- instead he challenges the statutory and constitutional foundation for other decisions made during his removal proceedings").

Court's narrow interpretation of §1252(g) in AADC, procedural due process claims remain subject to judicial review on habeas corpus as "'general collateral challenges to unconstitutional practices and policies used by'" the INS. Walters v. Reno, 145 F.3d 1032, 1052 (CA9 1998), cert. denied, 526 U.S. 1003 (1999) (quoting McNary v. Haitian Refugee Center, Inc., 498 U.S. 479, 492 (1991)). The conflict between the rule applied by the Seventh Circuit and the rule applied by these other circuits is apparent from a brief comparison of the cases as viewed against the backdrop of the rule that emerges from AADC. Indeed, while this Court's opinion in AADC did not decide whether §1252(g) precludes judicial review of habeas claims, it noted that "[t]here is disagreement on this point in the Courts of Appeals." 525 U.S. at 480 n.7. Unfortunately, the Courts of Appeals remain divided on this question.

In AADC, this Court gave §1252(g) a "narrow reading," refusing to interpret it as covering the spectrum of deportation orders. Id. at 487. In fact, the Court expressly rejected the notion that §1252(g) "covers the universe of deportation claims -- that it is a sort of a 'zipper' clause that says 'no judicial review in deportation cases unless this section provides judicial review.'" Id. at 482. Rather the Court indicated that §1252(g) is "much narrower" and applies only to "three discrete actions that the Attorney General may take: her 'decision or action' to 'commence proceedings, adjudicate cases or execute removal orders.'" Id. (quoting §1252(g)). The Court buttressed this interpretation by relying on the apparent rationale underlying §1252(g). Specifically, the Court reasoned that Congress enacted this provision to "give some measure of protection to 'no deferred action' decisions and similar discretionary determinations." Id. at 485. In other words, the Court concluded that §1252(g) was enacted to prevent the federal courts from interfering with the Attorney General's prosecutorial discretion.

As applied by the nine circuit courts that conflict with the Seventh Circuit, §1252(g), as interpreted in AADC, would not preclude jurisdiction over Petitioners' claims that Mr. Botezatu was denied due process. These courts have been primarily guided by the logic of two interrelated principles that now stand diametrically opposed to the Seventh Circuit's position. First, they have held that habeas review remains available in cases where petitioners are not challenging the substance of the INS's decisions but rather the constitutionality of the procedures used in reaching those decisions. Second, the majority of Courts of Appeals have interpreted AADC as construing §1252(g) narrowly so as to preclude only direct challenges to the Attorney General's discretion to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders. Simply put, §1252(g) protects only the Attorney General's discretion to prosecute.

A. THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT'S DECISION CONFLICTS WITH OTHER COURTS OF APPEALS BY FAILING TO DISTINGUISH BETWEEN CHALLENGES TO THE MERITS OF INS DECISIONS AND CHALLENGES TO THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE PROCEDURES USED IN REACHING THOSE DECISIONS.

In contrast to the court below, most Courts of Appeals have recognized that habeas review remains available in immigration cases where, in the words of the Ninth Circuit, the petitioners' objective is "not to obtain judicial review of the merits of their INS proceedings, but rather to enforce their constitutional rights to due process in the context of those proceedings."[3] Thus, the great majority of the Courts of Appeals have held that while §1252(g) clearly precludes challenges to the outcome of the Attorney General's decision to prosecute (for example, a claim that the Attorney General or INS should have granted a petitioner some form of deferred action), it does not strip the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear habeas petitions challenging the process by which the decision was made (for example, a claim that the Attorney General or INS based the decision to prosecute a petitioner's deportation on his or her race).

[3] Walters v. Reno, 145 F.3d 1032, 1052 (CA9 1998), cert. denied, 526 U.S. 1003 (1999) (emphasis added) (holding that the federal courts had jurisdiction over due process claims challenging the adequacy of the notice a class of aliens received concerning their possible deportation for document fraud). See also Barahona-Gomez v. Reno, 167 F.3d 1228, 1234 (CA9 1999) (quoting this language from Walters in holding that, by its terms, §1252(g) does not preclude jurisdiction over due process claims).

In the instant case, the Botezatus' procedural due process claims are not attacks on the merits of the Attorney General's decision to deport or claims that the INS should have granted Mr. Botezatu "deferred action." Rather, they are challenges to the constitutionality of the procedures used in reaching decisions made after his deportation proceedings ended. Indeed, in a similar political asylum case where the petitioner challenged only the adequacy of INS procedures, the Fourth Circuit concluded that habeas review is available under §1252(g) where a petitioner seeks the minimum protections of due process and is improper where the prayer is to reverse a denial of deferred action. See Selgeka v. Carroll, 184 F.3d 337, 342 (CA4 1999). Likewise, the Eleventh Circuit has held that the federal courts have jurisdiction in cases where petitioners challenge the manner in which discretionary actions or decisions are rendered as opposed to the outcome of those decisions.[4]

[4]See Tefel v. Reno, 180 F.3d 1286, 1298 (CA11 1999), rehearing en banc denied, 198 F.3d 265 (CA11 1999) ("Plaintiffs' challenges . . . involve constitutional challenges to legislation specifically mandating [a certain] application of the stop-time rule. Plaintiffs' claims do not challenge the Attorney General's exercise of her discretion to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders."). See also Garcia-Guzman v. Reno, 65 F. Supp. 2d 1077, 1083 (N.D. Cal. 1999) (concluding that petitioner's claim was cognizable on habeas because he "is not claiming that the INS should have granted him 'deferred action' before adjudicating his case -- instead he challenges the

Here, the Botezatus are claiming that the INS violated their procedural due process rights. More specifically, their claim is that the INS's failure to provide a fair and adequate process for considering requests for humanitarian parole, voluntary departure, and stays of deportation resulted in a violation of due process. Thus, because Petitioners' procedural due process claims are not challenging the outcome of any INS decisions, but rather the procedures used in reaching them, they should be subject to federal habeas jurisdiction.

In accepting this line of reasoning in a similar case, the Sixth Circuit recognized that the "fact that the [petitioners] . . . seek a stay of deportation does not make their claim one against the decision to execute a removal order." Mustata v. U.S. Dep't of Justice, 179 F.3d 1017, 1023 (CA6 1999) (holding that §1252(g) did not strip the district court of jurisdiction over the petitioners' habeas claim that ineffective assistance of counsel at their deportation hearings violated due process). "[Any] argument to the contrary," the Sixth Circuit continued, "confuses the substance of the [petitioners'] claim with the remedy requested." Id. Hence, the fact that the effect of Petitioners' claim may be to prevent the Attorney General from executing a deportation order against Mr. Botezatu is not dispositive. Otherwise, as the Third Circuit cautioned, statutory and constitutional foundation for other decisions made during his removal proceedings").

"every deportation-related challenge . . . could be deemed a suit to stop the 'execution' of a deportation order." DeSousa v. Reno, 190 F.3d 175, 182 (CA3 1999). Thus, where there is no challenge to the merits of the Attorney General's decision to prosecute, the Third, Fourth, Sixth, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits are "satisfied that [the petitioner] has not presented a challenge 'arising from the decision or action . . . to execute removal orders.'" Zhislin v. Reno, 195 F.3d 810, 814 (CA6 1999) (quoting AADC, 525 U.S. at 482).

B. THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT'S DECISION CONFLICTS WITH OTHER COURTS OF APPEALS BY GIVING §1252(G) A BROADER INTERPRETATION THAN JUSTIFIED BY ITS LANGUAGE OR THIS COURT'S DECISION IN AADC.

The Seventh Circuit also stands apart from the other circuits with regard to the breadth of its application of §1252(g) -- that is, its interpretation is unduly expansive. The Seventh Circuit understands AADC to stand for the proposition that §1252(g) precludes habeas review of all challenges to "'no deferred action' decisions and similar discretionary determinations" irrespective of whether they challenge a decision or action to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders. Botezatu, 195 F.3d at 314 (App. A). In other words, under the Seventh Circuit's model, all of the Attorney General's discretionary decisions are immune from habeas review.

Clearly, this view is overbroad. In fact, it directly conflicts with AADC's observation that it is "implausible" to claim that §1252(g)'s "mention of three discrete events along the road to deportation was a shorthand way of referring to all claims arising from deportation proceedings." 525 U.S. at 482. Moreover, the Seventh Circuit's broad interpretation of §1252(g) would preclude jurisdiction even in cases that AADC expressly indicates fall outside the scope of §1252(g). For instance, while the Court's opinion in AADC noted that "decisions to open an investigation . . . and to refuse reconsideration of [a deportation] order" do not come within the ambit of §1252(g),[5] even these two examples fit comfortably within the Seventh Circuit's expansive view of §1252(g) because they constitute "similar discretionary determinations." Indeed, the Fourth and Sixth Circuits as well as the Northern District of California have noted that "[b]ecause some of the examples [listed in AADC] could be squeezed into one of the three listed actions if the actions were to be read expansively, the examples reinforce the Court's express statement that §1252(g) 'applies only to [5]525 U.S. at 482 ("There are of course many other decisions or actions that may be part of the deportation process -- such as the decisions to open an investigation, to surveil the suspected violator, to reschedule the deportation hearing, to include various provisions in the final order that is the product of the adjudication, and to refuse reconsideration of that order. It is implausible that the mention of three discrete events along the road to deportation was a shorthand way of referring to all claims arising from deportation proceedings.").

three discrete actions.'"[6]

In contrast to the Seventh Circuit's broad view of §1252(g), a majority of the Courts of Appeals that have faced this issue have held that, as a result of AADC's narrow construction of §1252(g), claims arising from the deportation process are not necessarily barred. In Zhislin v. Reno, 195 F.3d 810, 813 (CA6 1999), for example, the Sixth Circuit relied on this Court's opinion in AADC in concluding that "claims arising from [the deportation process] are still subject to the jurisdiction of the federal courts." The Sixth Circuit therefore held that a petitioner's due process claims are subject to judicial review if they arise from the U.S. Dep't of Justice*, 179 F.3d 1017 1021 (CA6 1999) (quoting AADC, 525 U.S. at 482) (holding that petitioner's ineffective assistance of counsel claim did not involve a challenge to the Attorney General's decision to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders and thus was reviewable on habeas). See also Stewart v. INS, 181 F.3d 587, 594 (CA4 1999) (concluding that habeas jurisdiction was available there because "a motion to reopen is very similar to a motion to reconsider" and AADC specifically excluded motions to reconsider from §1252(g)'s scope); Garcia-Guzman v. Reno, 65 F. Supp. 2d 1077, 1082-83 (N.D. Cal. 1999) ("To confirm the narrowness of section 1252(g), the Court also listed examples of 'many other' decisions or actions that are part of the deportation process but nevertheless fall outside section 1252(g)'s reach. These examples all cover decisions that could arguably be construed as part of the decision to commence proceedings or adjudicate cases. Thus, §1252(g) is properly read to cover only the three discrete actions enumerated therein.").

deportation proceedings so long as they do not directly challenge the three discrete events listed in §1252(g). Likewise, the Eighth Circuit observed in Shah v. Reno, 184 F.3d 719, 722 (CA8 1999), that "[t]he words 'commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders' refer to separate and discrete actions in the deportation process" and consequently §1252(g) "has nothing to do" with cases where "review is sought of a final order of deportation." The First, Fourth, Fifth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits have all reached similar conclusions.[7]

[7]See Wallace v. Reno, 194 F.3d 279, 285 (CA1 1999) (noting that "[t]he Supreme Court's surprisingly narrow reading of [§1252(g)] . . . certainly does not encourage us to enlarge the reach of that section" and concluding that the federal courts may entertain habeas petitions challenging the constitutionality of final orders of deportation); Selgeka v. Carroll, 184 F.3d 337, 341 (CA4 1999) (holding that §1252(g) did not apply to due process claim challenging the refusal to permit petitioner to present his application to an immigration judge in a deportation hearing); Requena-Rodriguez v. Reno, 190 F.3d 299, 303 (CA5 1999) (holding that district courts have jurisdiction to hear habeas petitions that challenge a final order of deportation because such a challenge does not fall under one of the three discrete actions listed in §1252(g)); Jurado-Gutierrez v. Greene, --- F.3d ---- (CA10 1999) (1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 30711, at *13) (holding that a final order of deportation remains reviewable on habeas because it does "not interfere with the Attorney General's decision to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute a removal order"); Richardson v. Reno, 180 F.3d 1311, 1312 (CA11 1999), rehearing en banc denied, 193 F.3d 525 (CA11 1999) (concluding, based on this Court's interpretation of §1252(g), that a habeas petition challenging the constitutionality of petitioners' removal from the United States or their detention while awaiting

Some courts have gone even further. For example, the Third Circuit, in facing a similar issue, relied on the fact that AADC "explicitly rejected a broad interpretation" of §1252(g) in concluding that the statute "only applies to suits challenging the government's selective enforcement of the immigration laws." DeSousa v. Reno, 190 F.3d 175, 182 (CA3 1999) (emphasis added). Because the petitioner's claim in that case "was not brought on this ground," the Third Circuit ruled that §1252(g) did not preclude consideration of a habeas petition challenging the final order of deportation issued against him. Id. at 182-83 ("As [§1252(g)] does not apply to DeSousa, . . . the district court had jurisdiction to consider DeSousa's habeas petition, including both his constitutional and statutory claims.").

Thus, under the view taken by the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Eighth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits, Petitioners' claims would not be barred by §1252(g) because they do not challenge the three discrete decisions protected by the statute. Petitioners have not challenged the Attorney General's decision to commence proceedings, adjudicate a removal does not constitute a challenge to the decision to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders, although ultimately holding that habeas jurisdiction was not available in that case based on other provisions of post-IIRIRA law); Mayers v. Reno, 175 F.3d 1289, 1297 (CA11 1999) (holding that final orders of deportation are reviewable because §1252(g) excludes from judicial review only three discrete decisions or actions of the Attorney General).

case, or execute a removal order against Mr. Botezatu, but rather the processes by which various decisions were made after his deportation hearing.

II. THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT'S DECISION IMPROPERLY AND UNNECESSARILY RAISES THE SERIOUS CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION CONCERNING THE SCOPE OF CONGRESS'S POWER TO STRIP THE FEDERAL COURTS OF JURISDICTION OVER CONSTITUTIONAL CLAIMS.

In ruling against Petitioners and adopting such an expansive view of §1252(g), the Seventh Circuit construed the statute to foreclose judicial review of constitutional claims arising from INS proceedings that take place after a deportation hearing. The court's decision thus unnecessarily creates what this Court has referred to as "a serious constitutional question" -- the extent to which Congress has the constitutional power to restrict the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Bowen v. Michigan Academy of Family Physicians, 476 U.S. 667, 681 n.12 (1986).[1]

This Court has consistently cautioned that there is a "well-settled presumption favoring interpretations of statutes that allow judicial review of administrative action." McNary v. Haitian Refugee Center, Inc., 498 U.S. 479, 480 (1991). Therefore, "where Congress intends to preclude judicial review of constitutional claims," this Court has held that Congress's "intent to do so must be clear." Webster v. Doe, 486 U.S. 592, 603 (1988) (citing Johnson v. Robinson, 415 U.S. 361, 373-74 (1974)). Clear evidence of congressional intent is required "in part to avoid the 'serious constitutional question' that would arise if a federal statute were construed to deny any judicial forum for a colorable constitutional claim." Id. (quoting Bowen, 476 U.S. at 681 n.12). In this case, however, not only did the Court of Appeals construe "a federal statute . . . to deny any judicial forum for a colorable constitutional claim," but it did so without a clear showing of congressional intent to preclude judicial review of those claims, and in spite of this Court's deliberately limited decision in AADC.

The Seventh Circuit's creation of this serious constitutional question began with its mischaracterization of the claims Petitioners presented to the court on appeal. The Court of Appeals understood Petitioners to be challenging the results of proceedings that took place after the INS decided to deport Mr. Botezatu -- specifically, the INS's refusal to grant his requests for a stay of deportation, reinstatement of voluntary departure, and humanitarian parole. As explained above in Part I(A), however, Petitioners' procedural due process claims are not challenging the results of these proceedings or the result of Mr. Botezatu's deportation hearing. Instead, they are challenging the procedures used by the INS in making these decisions.

Based on its erroneous assumption about the nature of Petitioners' claims, the Seventh Circuit determined that this Court's decision in AADC precludes the federal courts from hearing this case. In so doing, the Court of Appeals not only ignored this Court's refusal to give §1252(g) an excessively broad reading (as explained above in Part I(B)), but also ignored AADC's description of §1252(g) as "specifically directed at the deconstruction, fragmentation, and hence prolongation of removal proceedings." 525 U.S. at 486. Petitioners, however, are not seeking "separate rounds of judicial intervention." Id. at 485. Rather, their claims focus on the procedures used by the INS in making decisions after Mr. Botezatu's deportation hearing, claims that did not arise and therefore could not possibly have been raised on his direct appeal from that hearing.[2]

[2]For this reason, Petitioners' case is also distinguishable from the situation presented to this Court in Felker v. Turpin, 518 U.S. 651 (1996). Felker upheld the constitutionality of a provision in the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act that prohibited this Court from reviewing the lower courts' denial of a "second or successive" habeas petition. Petitioners' claims do not involve a "second or successive" request for review of the constitutionality of INS procedures. Instead, this case constitutes Petitioners' first and only opportunity to challenge the constitutionality of INS procedures used subsequent to Mr. Botezatu's deportation hearing. Additionally, in upholding the statutory provision at issue in Felker, the Court noted that Congress did "not deprive

The Seventh Circuit's mischaracterization of Petitioners' case and its failure to recognize the difference between their claims and those this Court held to be covered by §1252(g) yields a disconcerting result: the federal courts are stripped of jurisdiction to consider any constitutional challenges arising from INS proceedings subsequent to a deportation hearing. Nothing in this Court's decision in AADC or in the legislative purposes underlying §1252(g) indicates that Congress intended to grant the INS such broad immunity from constitutional accountability. By ignoring this Court's admonition that the long-standing presumption favoring judicial review of administrative decisions can be overcome only by clear evidence of congressional intent, the Seventh Circuit improperly created "the 'serious constitutional question' that [arises when] a federal statute [is] construed to deny any judicial forum for a colorable constitutional claim." Webster v. Doe, 486 U.S. at 603 (quoting Bowen v. Michigan Academy of Family Physicians, 476 U.S. at 681 n.12).

this Court of jurisdiction to entertain original habeas petitions." Id. at 654. In this case, however, if the Seventh Circuit's expansive interpretation of §1252(g) is upheld, Petitioners have no alternative judicial forum comparable to the one that existed in Felker.

III. THIS CASE RAISES RECURRING, IMPORTANT ISSUES THAT THIS COURT SHOULD RESOLVE.

The recent flood of federal cases cited in this petition demonstrates that the factual scenario involved in this case -- a claim, via a habeas petition, alleging systemic problems at the INS that deprive petitioners and others similarly situated of due process or other constitutional rights -- is hardly unique. In addition to this case, decisions from nine other circuits have likewise involved INS attempts to dismiss habeas petitions for want of jurisdiction pursuant to §1252(g). In each case, the INS argued that §1252(g) bars challenges that relate to the Attorney General's exercise of her discretion to prosecute (i.e., deport or remove). Without exception, the petitioners have responded that their challenges do not constitute an attack on the Attorney General's decision to "commence proceedings, to adjudicate cases, or to execute removal orders" and, moreover, that their challenges do not impermissibly tread on her prosecutorial discretion. The issue presented in this petition is thus both important and recurring.

In this case, Petitioners seek habeas relief to address systemic problems at the INS that violated their constitutionally guaranteed rights to procedural due process by: (1) failing to hold any hearings on certain applications from them and others; (2) pre-judging the merits of (i.e., "front-desking") certain applications before they were actually filed; and (3) discouraging asylum applicants from seeking appellate review of INS orders. The Seventh Circuit thought that §1252(g) barred these complaints because they amounted to attacks on the Attorney General's refusal to grant deferred action. That holding is possible only under an understanding of §1252(g) that ignores this Court's original explanation for construing §1252(g) narrowly to include only three discrete actions along the way to deportation. The decision below has broad implications for the scope of §1252(g) and creates a conflict with the rule of law applied by the great majority of the Courts of Appeals – a conflict that is unlikely to disappear given the Seventh Circuit's consistent adherence to an expansive interpretation of §1252(g) in cases other than this one.[1] Accordingly, this

Perryman*, 197 F.3d 236, 240 (CA7 1999) (giving lip service to the view that §1252(g) "precludes review of only the three listed discretionary decisions or actions of the Attorney General," but then going on to deny jurisdiction in that case because "[i]f [the petitioner's] motion to reopen his deportation proceedings had been successful, . . . it would have abrogated the . . . deportation order"); *Musto v. U.S. 7TH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS

v.
IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE and BRYAN PERRYMAN, Chicago District Director of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Defendants-Appellees.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.
No. 98 C 1965--George W. Lindberg, Judge.
Argued June 8, 1999--Decided October 21, 1999

Before COFFEY, EASTERBROOK and ROVNER, Circuit Judges.

ROVNER, Circuit Judge. Emil Botezatu, a native of Romania, entered the United States as a non- immigrant alien in transit on March 19, 1993 with his fianc, Gabriela, also Romanian, with whom he had been living nearly continuously since 1988. Upon arrival, each filed a claim for political asylum with the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Her application for asylum was granted and she became a lawful permanent resident alien, but his application was denied. He was authorized to remain until March 24, 1993, but he did not leave this country at that time. In June 1994, the INS issued an order to show cause alleging that he was deportable as an alien who remained in the United States beyond the authorized period. See 8 U.S.C. sec.sec. 1227, 1231(a)(1)(B). On June 30, 1995, an immigration judge found Botezatu deportable, denied his asylum application, and granted his application for voluntary departure.

On August 17, 1995, Botezatu married Gabriela. In January 1996, she filed a visa petition on her husband's behalf as a spouse of a permanent resident. The INS approved the petition, but no visas in the permanent resident category were available for him. On August 5, 1996, the Board of Immigration Appeals (the "Board") affirmed the immigration judge's decision of June 30, 1995, indicating that Botezatu might apply for an extension of the voluntary departure period. He petitioned this court to review the Board's decision but did not apply for an extension. In April 1997, we denied his petition in an unpublished order.

Botezatu requested that the INS District Director reinstate his voluntary departure. The District Director denied this request because, he said, Botezatu had violated the terms of his voluntary departure by failing to seek an extension after the Board's decision. The INS agreed, however, to postpone Botezatu's deportation while his request was pending for humanitarian parole or deferred action on the grounds of his desire to remain in this country with his wife. The agency denied this request in February 1998. Botezatu filed for a stay of deportation, but in March 1998, the District Director denied this application and the INS then ordered Botezatu to report for deportation on March 31, 1998.

On that date, however, the Botezatus instead filed this lawsuit in federal district court contesting several determinations of the Board relating to Emil Botezatu's deportation. They alleged that the district court had subject matter jurisdiction under 42 U.S.C. sec. 1983 (civil rights), 5 U.S.C. sec. 701 et seq. (the Administrative Procedure Act), and 28 U.S.C. sec.sec. 1331 (federal question jurisdiction) and 2241 (habeas corpus). Their complaint alleged that several actions or decisions of the Board violated various amendments to the federal Constitution, provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and customary norms of international law. The INS argued that the complaint should be dismissed for want of subject matter jurisdiction and the district court agreed, dismissing the case on November 20, 1998. The Botezatus appeal.

We review a dismissal for want of subject matter jurisdiction de novo. Jones v. United States, 112 F.3d 299, 301 (7th Cir. 1997), cert. denied, 118 S.Ct. 173 (1997). At issue is whether this case is governed by sec. 242(g) of the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), as amended by sec. 306(a) of the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, 110 Stat. 3009-546 ("IIRIRA"), and the proper interpretation of this provision in view of recent caselaw. The statute reads:

Except as provided in this section and notwithstanding any other provision of law, no court shall have jurisdiction to hear any cause or claim by or on behalf of any alien arising from the decision or action by the Attorney General to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders against any alien under this Act.

8 U.S.C. sec. 1252(g)./1 The Supreme Court has recently rejected the interpretation that "sec. 1252(g) covers the universe of deportation claims--that it is a sort of 'zipper' clause that says 'no judicial review in deportation cases unless this section provides judicial review.'" Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, 119 S.Ct. 936, 943 (1999) ("ADC"). In ADC, the Court held that sec. 1252(g) precludes only review of the three discretionary decisions or actions listed in the statute, namely, decisions to "'commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders.'" Id. The Botezatus argue that sec. 1252(g) does not apply to their case because they do not challenge any of these three listed types of decisions, but only the constitutionality of various post- deportation procedures. In particular, the Botezatus contend that the district court has jurisdiction over their claims attacking the INS's decisions in: (1) refusing to grant Botezatu's request for a stay of deportation, (2) failing to reinstate his administrative grant of voluntary departure, and (3) denying his request for humanitarian relief in the form of humanitarian parole.

The plaintiffs' arguments are not persuasive. They claim that the district court has jurisdiction over the INS's refusal to issue a stay of deportation, citing Cheng Fan Kwok v. INS, 392 U.S. 206 (1968). There the Supreme Court read the former INA sec. 106(a)(10), the then- effective immigration habeas provision, to provide a jurisdictional basis for a district court to review a stay of deportation. The Court held that in such an attack, the "petitioner did not attack the deportation order itself." Id. at 213. Unfortunately for the Botezatus, the statutory provision construed in Cheng which formerly allowed for the review they request has been repealed by sec. 401(e) of the Anti- Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 ("AEDPA"), see LaGuerre v. Reno, 164 F.3d 1035, 1038 (7th Cir. 1998), and the jurisdictional basis for district court review of a stay of deportation was removed by sec. 1252(g). In interpreting sec. 1252(g), the Supreme Court has disapproved Cheng, treating denial of a stay of deportation as one of "various decisions . . . leading up to or consequent upon final orders of deportation" which was within the scope of sec. 1252(g). ADC, 118 S.Ct at 944. The plaintiffs cite several cases suggesting that, notwithstanding sec. 1252(g), a district court may review denials of some other forms of ancillary relief not at issue here. Perhaps so. However, in ADC, the Supreme Court has indicated that a denial of a stay of deportation is not among the actions or decisions to which sec. 1252(g) is inapplicable.

The plaintiffs further contend that the Supreme Court's limited holding in ADC about the short list of decisions over which the district court lacks jurisdiction under sec. 1252(g) (decisions to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders) means that the district court has jurisdiction to review the refusal to reinstate Botezatu's voluntary departure or to grant him humanitarian parole or deferred action. This, they argue, is because they do not make a direct attack upon the final order of deportation nor on an order made during the deportation proceedings. The relief they request is not, therefore, on the list of precluded items. However, in ADC, the Supreme Court unambiguously read "'no deferred action' decisions and similar discretionary determinations" as governed by sec. 1252(g), saying that Congress intended to give these sorts of determinations "some measure of protection" from judicial review and provided that "if they are reviewable at all, they at least will not be made bases for separate rounds of judicial intervention." 119 S.Ct. at 944. Review of refusal to grant deferred action is for this reason excluded from the jurisdiction of the district court.

The question remains whether the INS's refusal to grant humanitarian parole or to reinstate Botezatu's voluntary departure falls within the class of "similar discretionary determinations" which the Supreme Court treated as relevantly analogous to "no deferred action" decisions, and so within the scope of sec. 1252(g). The plaintiffs themselves concede that humanitarian parole is a sort of relief functionally equivalent to deferred action--they request these two kinds of relief in the alternative. In any event they fail to suggest any distinctions among deferred action, humanitarian parole and voluntary departure which would exclude the latter two from the scope of sec. 1252(g) if deferred action comes under it. The distinction, if any, was theirs to make, and since they did not make it, the point is waived. See Parrillo v. Commercial Union Ins. Co., 85 F.3d 1245, 1249-1250 (7th Cir. 1996). The district court, then, had no jurisdiction over the Botezatus' claims, and was correct to dismiss the claims on that basis.

AFFIRMED.

/1 Botezatu's case is governed by the IIRIRA transition rules because removal proceedings commenced in this case before April 1, 1997. Thus, we consider the effect only of section 1252(g), and not any other subparts of that section. See Lalani v. Perryman, 105 F.3d 334, 336 (7th Cir. 1997) (as of April 1, 1997, subsection (g) will apply retroactively, unlike the other subsections).

Emil Botezatu V. INS
Case No: 98-cv-01965
ND Ill, October 21, 1998
Judge George W. Lindberg

Respondent Immigration and Naturalization Services (INS) requests the dismissal of petitioner Emil Botezatu's petition for a writ of habeas corpus for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Botezatu is currently awaiting deportation to Romania. He entered the United States on March 19, 1993, and applied for political asylum. The INS denied the application on May 3, 1994. In June 1995, an administrative judge found Botezatu to be deportable and granted plaintiff voluntary departure if he left the United States before October 30, 1995. The court order indicated that if plaintiff did not leave within the specified period, the privilege of voluntary departure automatically converted into a final order of deportation. In July 1995, Botezatu appealed the order of deportation to the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA). On August 17, 1995, petitioner married Gabriela Botezatu. In January 1996, petitioner's wife filed a visa petition on his behalf for a spouse of a permanent resident. Although the INS approved the visa petition, no visas within this category are currently available. Petitioner failed to depart the United States as of October 30, 1995. The BIA affirmed the order of deportation on August 5, 1996. Botezatu appealed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, which affirmed on April 17, 1997. On March 13, 1998, the INS again ordered Botezatu to report for deportation, this time by March 31, 1998. On that date, Botezatu filed the instant petition to stay his deportation and obtain review of the INS' deportation procedures. After reviewing the petition, this court must now dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Petitioner presents three bases for jurisdiction: 28 U.S.C. § 2241, 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 5 U.S.C. § 701. Not only do these statutes fail to give this court jurisdiction over the petition but § 242(g) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) specifically divests this court of jurisdiction over it. 8 U.S.C. § 1252(g). The section states that "no court shall have jurisdiction to hear any cause or claim by or on behalf of any alien arising from the decision or action by the Attorney General to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders against any alien under this chapter." 8 U.S.C. § 1252(g). Plaintiff claims that he is not directly appealing a final order of deportation but rather the hearing process afforded by the INS, making § 242(g) inapplicable. This argument is not persuasive. First, plaintiff filed this complaint on the last day available to stay his deportation, indicating that the complaint is "arising from" the final order of deportation. Second, the language of § 242(g) governs the hearing process as well as final orders of deportation when it gives the Attorney General exclusive jurisdiction over its power "to commence proceedings" and "adjudicate cases." Nor do the additional statutes petitioner cites provide jurisdiction. Section 242(g)'s grant of exclusive jurisdiction to the Attorney General over deportation cases divests district courts of their habeas corpus jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §

2241. Yang v. INS, 109 F.3d 1185, 1195 (7th Cir. 1997). Section 1983 may only be invoked when a person acting "under the color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia" deprives a person of a right guaranteed by the Constitution. 42 U.S.C. §1983 (emphasis added); see Wheedlin v. Wheeler, 373 U.S. 647, 650 (1963). In the present case, no state statute, ordinance or regulation is at issue but instead the actions of a federal agency. Finally, 5 U.S.C. § 701 is inapplicable to agency action that "is committed to agency discretion by law," which is the case here. Lalani v. Perryman, 105 F.3d 334, 337 (7th Cir. 1997). For these reasons, the court grants the motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

COMPLAINT

Emil and Gabriela Botezatu (collectively "Plaintiffs" or the "Botezatus"), by their attorneys, hereby complain of defendants Immigration and Naturalization Service, and Bryan Perryman, the Chicago District Director of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and for their Complaint Plaintiffs state as follows:

The Parties

1. Plaintiff Gabriela Botezatu ("Mrs. Botezatu") is a Lawful Permanent Resident of the United States and resides in Chicago, Illinois. In March 1993, Mrs. Botezatu fled her native Romania and came to the United States seeking asylum. She was granted asylum on October 5, 1993. A copy of the decision granting her asylum is annexed.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS
REC'D BY _____ SM
[Illegible] NOT VERIFIED

2. Plaintiff Emil Botezatu ("Mr. Botezatu") is Mrs. Botezatu's husband. The couple have resided together continuously since 1988. In March 1993, Mr. Botezatu came to the United States seeking asylum. However, his asylum case was denied. Mr. Botezatu has no criminal record at all.

3. Defendant INS is an agency of the federal government within the Department of Justice and is the agency in charge of enforcing the INA, 8 U.S.C. §1101 et. seq.

4. Defendant Chicago District Director of the INS is charged with the duty of administration and enforcement of all the functions and powers and duties of the INS.

Jurisdiction and Venue

5. Jurisdiction is proper in this Court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §2241 (Habeas Corpus), U.S.C. §1331 (Federal Questions); 42 U.S.C. §1983 (Civil Rights Statutes) and the Administrative Procedures Act, 5 U.S.C. §701 et. seq.

6. Venue is proper in this district under 28 U.S.C. §1391(b) because a substantial part of the events giving rise to Plaintiff's claims occurred here.

Facts

7. Plaintiffs Emil and Gabriela Botezatu were born in Romania and grew up there under the rule of Communist Dictator Nicolae Ceauescu.

8. Mr. Botezatu grew up in an abusive home. He met Mrs. Botezatu in 1988 and began dating her. Later that year, he was invited to move in with her family and did so. He has lived with Mrs. Botezatu continuously since that time up to present.

9. The Botezatus opposed the regime of Communist Dictator Nicolae Ceausescu and later opposed the regime of his successor Ion Iliescu. They participated in demonstrations together and had similar problems on account of their political opinions.

10. The Botezatus lived together but did not marry during this time. In light of their political problems, they knew they might have to flee Romania at any time and were informed by colleagues that their chances of obtaining a visa to come to the United Sates were better if they were married. (See Affidavit of Gabriela Botezatu, annexed as part of Group Exhibit 1).

11. On March 19, 1993 the Botezatus fled Romania and made separate claims for asylum in the United States. Prior to claiminig asylum, they were mistakenly advised by the person who assisted them with their asylum applications not to get married prior to making their claims.

12. The Botezatus filed separate asylum applications in 1993. Despite the fact that these were separate applications, virtually all of the core facts were the same.

13. On October 5, 1993, Mrs. Botezatu was granted asylum by the INS asylum office. The asylum grant indicates that the INS has determined that Mrs. Botezatu has a well-founded fear of persecution should she return to Romania. A copy of Mrs. Botezatu's asylum grant is annexed as part of Group Exhibit 1.

14. Mr. Botezatu's asylum claim was denied by the INS asylum office and his case was eventually presented to an immigration judge in deportation proceedings. The judge denied the case and Mr. Botezatu appealed.

15. In the meantime, in light of the changed circumstances (i.e. Mrs. Botezatu already won her case and Mr. Botezatu was fighting his), the couple were legally married on August 17, 1995. A copy of their marriage certificate is annexed as part of Group Exhibit 1.

16. Mrs. Botezatu became a Lawful Permanent Resident on June 1, 1994 and in January, 1996, she applied for permanent residence for Mr. Botezatu. This application was approved on 1996, but there are currently no visa numbers available for Mr. Botezatu to immigrate pursuant to this approved petition. A copy of the approval is annexed as Exhibit 2.

17. On April 7, 1997 Mr. Botezatu exhausted the appeals on his asylum case when the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit rejected the appeal.

18. On May 1, 1997 Mr. Botezatu, through newly retained counsel, filed a motion to reinstated the period of voluntary departure granted to him by the immigration judge and the Board of Immigration Appeals. A copy of his Motion for Reinstatement is annexed as Exhibit 3.

19. The INS did not respond to the Motion and on May 30, 1997 a second request was sent to the INS regarding this issue. A copy of the second request is annexed as Exhibit 4.

20. On June 6, 1997, the INS denied the Motion to Reinstate Voluntary Departure. A copy of the denial is annexed as Exhibit 5. No reason was given for the denial if this Motion.

21. The Chicago District Officer of the INS does not have a consistent policy on extending or reinstating voluntary departure during a Seventh Circuit appeal of an asylum case and, on information and belief, may be using its ability to grant extensions/reinstatement as a means to discourage asylum applicants from pursuing non-frivolous appeals. In one case, counsel was informed by a deportation officer that refusal to extend/reinstated voluntary departure was done to penalize people who "sue the INS" by seeking Seventh Circuit review of asylum cases.

22. On June 20, 1997 Mr. Botezatu erroneously received a form I-166, a "bag and baggage" letter, requesting that he report for deportation to Bulgaria on July 10, 1997. A copy of this letter is annexed as Exhibit 6.

23. On July 8, 1997, Mr. Botezatu's counsel called the deportation officer in charge of Mr. Botezatu's case. A letter confirming parts of this conversation is annexed as Exhibit 7. In this conversation, counsel informed the officer that a mistake had been made and that Mr. Botezatu was from Romania, not Bulgaria. In addition, during the foregoing conversation counsel informed the officer that Mr. Botezatu would be seeking a stay of deportation, deferred action, or in the alternative humanitarian parole. Before any discussion of the facts of Mr. Botezatu's case, the officer informed counsel that the request for a stay would be denied, and that he was under a directive to deny all requests for a stay unless they involved serious medical reasons.

24. On information and belief, within the last 2-3 years the Chicago District office of the INS has adopted a policy of automatically denying, without thorough consideration, requests for stays of deportation unless based on serious medical reasons. Other factors are not considered.

25. In addition, during the above conversation, the deportation officer requested that counsel not file an application for a stay of deportation since such requests required him to work since they had to be responded to in writing. The officer also informed counsel of another directive that any request for a stay would automatically result in Mr. Botezatu being taken into INS custody and jailed.

26. During the foregoing conversation, the deportation officer agreed to postpone Mr. Botezatu's deportation while his request for humanitarian parole, or in the alternative, deferred action, was pending. (See Exhibit 7)

27. Mrs. Botezatu filed Group Exhibit 1, a request for humanitarian parole for Mr. Botezatu or in the alternative deferred action on July 9, 1997, paying the filing fee of $70. The request was accompanied by a letter from U.S. Senator Carol Moseley-Braun, expert and fact affidavits, economic and other evidence attesting to the humanitarian and public interest reasons for keeping Mr. Botezatu and his wife together in the United States.

28. Approximately one week later, the deportation officer called counsel and informed him that because the request for humanitarian parole or alternatively deferred action was accompanied by a Senator's letter, his superiors had told him that he could not keep his earlier agreement and would have to take action to deport Mr. Botezatu, but would give him additional time to prepare for deportation.

29. Soon after this conversation, in or around August 1997, the Washington D.C. office of the INS made an inquiry into the case. At this time, counsel spoke again with the deportation officer who agreed not to take action in the case until the request for humanitarian parole had been adjudicated. Counsel was informed that humanitarian parole requests were handled by the examination branch of the INS and that this branch had not yet requested Mr. Botezatu's file. Counsel requested that the humanitarian parole request be adjudicated. A letter confirming this request is annexed as Exhibit 8.

30. Counsel was subsequently informed that the Washington D.C. office of the INS had referred the matter back to the Chicago District Office for a decision and on October 21, 1997 counsel spoke again with the deportation officer who informed him that the humanitarian parole request was being handled by the Examinations Branch of the INS and that such requests could not be handled by the Deportation Branch. During the conversation, the officer informed counsel that he had spoken to someone from the Examinations Branch and that there was a 90% chance that the humanitarian parole application would be denied. However, the officer informed counsel at the Examinations Branch had not looked at the file.

31. In or around January 1998 the examinations branch of the INS called counsel and informed him that it could not grant the humanitarian parole request because humanitarian parole requests could not be granted for people present in the United States. Counsel informed the INS that this was not the law and ran contrary to INS regulations and practice. In fact, the INS has granted humanitarian parole to people present in the United States. The officer's response was that the matter would be handled by the deportation branch and to call them.

32. Counsel called the District Director and other officials several times to correct the misunderstanding of law regarding humanitarian parole. Within the next few days, counsel received a call from one of the supervisors at the Deportation Branch who informed counsel that the Deportation Branch could not consider humanitarian parole requests. She advised counsel to file an application for a stay of deportation. Since neither the Deportation Branch nor the Examinations Branch could advise counsel who or how the humanitarian parole application would be decided, counsel filed an application application for a stay of deportation on February 4, 1998. A copy of the application for a stay of deportation and cover letter are annexed as Exhibit 9. Counsel re-submitted, as part of the application for a stay of deportation, all of the affidavits and other supporting exhibits contained in Group Exhibit 1.

33. In early February 1998 Defendants wrote Plaintiffs a letter denying them "advance parole". A copy of the letter is annexed as Exhibit 10. The letter merely states that they don't qualify for "advance parole". The letter does not contain any standards for determining humanitarian parole of discuss the arguments made by Plaintiffs.

34. On March 11, 1998 the stay of deportation was denied. A copy of the denial is annexed as Exhibit 11.

35. On March 13, 1998 the INS issued another "bag and baggage letter" requesting that Mr. Botezatu report for deportation on March 31, 1998, and placing him in the constructive custody of the INS. A copy of this letter is annexed as Exhibit 12.

36. The Defendants never held a hearing on whether Mr. Botezatu, who is married to an asylee/lawful permanent resident, may remain in the United States.

37. Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Botezatu have returned to Romania since fleeing there in 1993.

COUNT I

(Violation of the Substantive Due Process Protected by the Fifth, Ninth, Tenth and Other Amendments of the U.S. Constitution)

38. Plaintiffs re-allege and incorporate paragraphs 1 through 37 as if fully set forth herein.

39. The United States Supreme Court has found that there are certain fundamental rights emanating from the guarantees of the United States Constitution. Among those rights is the right to privacy, which includes freedom from government intervention in family affairs, particularly in marital relationships.

40. The actions of the defendants in attempting to deport Mr. Botezatu and in refraining from taking actions which would allow him to stay in the United States substantially interfere with his and his family's right to privacy in that the defendants will be wrenching apart Mr. Botezatu from his wife.

41. There are no compelling state interests for the defendant's interference in this case since Mr. Botezatu has never been convicted of any crimes and, by all accounts, has been a useful member of society for the past five years he has been here.

42. Mr. and Mrs. Botezatu have been injured and damaged by the defendants interference with their marriage in that they may be separated for at least 10 years and would be subjected to additional substantial hardships if Mr. Botezatu is deported.

COUNT II

(Violation of Article 23 of the International Convention of Civil and Political Rights)

43. Plaintiffs re-allege and incorporate paragraphs 1 through 42 as if fully set forth herein.

44. Article II of the United States Constitution declares all treaties of the United States to be Federal Law.

45. The United States is a signatory to the International Convention of Civil and Political Rights (the "Convention"), which was ratified in 1992.

46. Article 23 of the Convention obligates signatory states, including the United States, to protect the right of marriage.

47. In deporting Mr. Botezatu, in refraining from taking actions to allow him from taking action to allow him to stay in the United States, and in failing to hold any sort of hearing regarding him staying in the United States based on his marriage, the INS is in violation of Article 23 of the Convention.

48. Plaintiffs have been damaged by defendant's actions in that they may be separated for at least 10 years and would be subjected to additional substantial hardships if Mr. Botezatu is deported.

COUNT III

(Violation of Pre-emptory Standards of International Law/jus cogens. Through

49. Plaintiffs re-allege and incorporate paragraphs 1 through 48 as if fully set forth herein.

50. Marriage is a recognized human right under U.S. national and customary international law. (See e.g., Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Article 16, American Convention of Human Rights)

51. The United States is obligated to follow customary international law. (See Article II, Section 2, U.S. Const. See also Restatement of Law of Foreign Relations.3rd, Section 101, 102 and 111)

52. The United States is obligated to refrain from gross and consistent patters of violation of human rights under international law, (see e.g., Restatement of the Law of Foreign Relations 3rd sections 701 and 702).

53. By deporting Emil Botezatu and possibly subjecting him to a 10 separation from his wife, the United States government substantially interferes with the Botezatus' right of marriage. By denying the Botezatus the right to a hearing on the merits whether relief should be granted and Emil Botezatu should be allowed to remain in the United States, the United States commits a gross violation of their human rights.

51. By refusing the same right to other persons similarly situated, believed upon information and belief to number in the hundreds if not thousands, the United States engages in a consistent pattern of abusing human rights, in violation of its obligations under the U.S. Constition and pre-emptory standards of international law, (jus cogens).

54. By deporting Mr. Botezatu, failing to accommodate his requests to stay in the United States (humanitarian parole, stay of deportation) and failing to hold a hearing on whether he should be separated from his wife, the INS has violated customary international law.

55. Plaintiffs have been damaged by defendant's actions in that they may be separated for at least 10 years and would be subjected to additional substantial hardships if Mr. Botezatu is deported.

COUNT IV

(Flawed Decision Making Procedures on Stays of Deportation Resulting in the Denial of Procedural Due Process Under the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution)

56. Plaintiffs re-allege and incorporate paragraphs 1 through 55 as if fully set forth herein.

57. The Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution provides that "No person shall...be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

58. The Defendant policy of pre-deciding requests for stays of deportation before they are even filed and automatically denying, without thorough consideration, stays of deportation for people unless they have serious medical problems, violates procedural due process.

59. In addition, the Defendants erred as a matter of law in failing to address the legal factors necessary for a stay and the case law regarding stays of deportation in similar circumstances.

60. Defendant's also erred as a matter of fact in failing to recognize that Plaintiffs damages are far worse than other who may be separated in that in other cases, the person with immigration status in the U.S. can reside their spouse, whereas in this case Mrs. Botezatu cannot reside with Mr. Botezatu in Romania since the INS has already determined that she has a well-founded fear of persecution should she return there.

61. Plaintiffs were severely damaged and prejudiced by the due process violations outlined above, in that they were denied a fair hearing on their request for a stay, Mr. Botezatu is now scheduled to be deported from the United States and may be barred from being with his wife for 10 years.

COUNT V

(Flawed Decision Making Procedures on Extensions and Reinstatement of Voluntary Departure Resulting in the Denial of Procedural Due Process Under the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution)

62. Plaintiffs re-allege and incorporate paragraphs 1 through 65 as if fully set forth herein.

63. The Fifth Amendment of the United States

Constitution provides that "No person shall… be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

The Defendants failure to adopt a procedure on humanitarian parole, failure to enunciate any legal standards or specific reasons for denying it in this case violates due process of law.

64. The Defendants also erred as a matter of law in failing to recognize that under their own regulations and practice and humanitarian parole applications may be granted to people in the United States.

65. Plaintiffs were severely damaged and prejudiced by the due process violations outlined above, in that Mr. Botezatu was denied his previously granted privilege of voluntary departure, is scheduled to be deported from the United States, and may be barred from immigrating to the United States to be with his wife for the next 10 years.

COUNT VI

(Flawed Decision Making Procedures on Humanitarian Parole Applications Resulting in the Denial of Procedural Due Process Under the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution)

66. Plaintiffs re-allege and incorporate paragraphs 1 through 70 as if fully set forth herein.

67. The Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution provides that "No person shall …be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

68. The Defendants failure to adopt a procedure on humanitarian parole, failure to enunciate any legal standards or specific reasons for denying it in this case violates due process of law.

69. The Defendants also erred as a matter of law in failing to recognize that under their own regulations and practice humanitarian parole applications may be granted to people in the United States.

70. Plaintiffs were severely damaged and prejudiced by the due process violations and errors or law outlined above, in that Mr. Botezatu is scheduled to be deported from the United States, and may be barred from immigrating to the United States to be with his wife for the next 10 years.

COUNT VII

(Inconsistent Decision Making Procedures in Asylum Process Resulting in the Denial of Procedural Due Process Under the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution)

71. Plaintiffs re-allege and incorporate paragraphs 1 through 70 as if fully set forth herein.

72. The Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution provides that "No person shall... be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

73. The Defendants violated due process in denying Mr. Botezatu asylum while granting it to Mrs.

Botezatu when the Botezatu's lived together in Romania and many of the core facts of their cases are identical.

74. Plaintiffs were severely damaged and prejudiced by the due process violations and errors or law outlined above, in that Mr. Botezatu was denied asylum, is scheduled to be deported from the United States, and may be barred from immigrating to the United States to be with his wife for the next 10 years.

COUNT VIII

(Cruel and Unusual Punishment in Violation of the Eighth Amendment of the United States Constitution)

75. Plaintiffs re-allege and incorporate paragraphs 1 through 74 as if fully set forth herein.

76. The Eighth Amendment to the United States Constitution provides that: "Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted."

77. Deporting Mr. Botezatu would be cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment in that he has not committed any crimes, may be separated from his wife for at least 10 years and be subjected to additional substantial hardships if deported.

WHEREFORE, Plaintiffs prays that this honorable court:

I. Issue an order prohibiting the INS from detaining Mr. Botezatu pending the resolution of this case, and allowing him to stay in the United States until such time as a decision rendered by this Court after a full review of the merits of this case.

II. Issue an order compelling the Defendants to allow Mr. and Mrs. Botezatu to stay together in the United States since their separation violates their right to privacy and the above treaties.

III. Issue an order compelling Defendants to remedy the procedural problems set forth above since they violate due process of law.

IV. Grant Plaintiffs their attorney's fees under the Equal Access to Justice Act, 28 U.S.C.§2412.

V. Grant any other and further relief that this Court may deem fit and proper.

Dear Mr. Botezatu:

This is in response to your request for authorization for humanitarian parole of alien into the United States, filed on July 9, 1997.

After careful review and consideration of the facts presented, it has been concluded that you do not fall under any of the categories of aliens who are eligible for issuance of an advance parole pursuant to O.I. 212.5(c). Therefore, your application for an advance parole is hereby denied. There is no appeal of this decision.

IN THE MATTER OF:

BOTEZATU, EMIL
(A72 135 377)

IN BEHALF OF APPLICANT: Robert A. Perkins
Attorney at Law
601 S. LaSalle Street
Chicago, Illinois 60605

APPLICATION: Stay of Deportation – Title 8, Code of Federal Regulations, Part 241.6

BASIS OF APPLICATION: On February 05, 1998, the applicant filed an application for a stay of deportation on Form I-246. The reasons for the stay request the applicant has provided are as follows:

Mr. Botezatu's deportation would cause emotional and economic hardship. His spouse can not return to their own country since she has been granted asylum in the United States.

BACKGROUND: The applicant is a 34-year-old native and citizen of Romania who last entered the United States at Chicago, Illinois, on March 19, 1993, as an alien in transit. On April 8, 1993, the applicant filed for asylum. On April 12, 1994, the applicant's request for asylum in the United States was denied. On June 14, 1994, the Service issued an order to show cause to the applicant, charging deportability under Section 241(a)(1)(B) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA).

On June 30, 1995, the applicant was found deportable by an immigration judge, as the subject admitted the factual allegations contained in the order to show cause and conceded the charge of deportability. In lieu of deportation, voluntary departure was granted until October 30, 1995. The applicant appealed the immigration judge's decision to the Board of Immigration Appeals (BIA). On August 5, 1996, the BIA dismissed the applicant's appeal. On August 30, 1996, a petition for review was filed with the United States Court of Appeals. The Board of Immigration Appeals decision was affirmed by the Court.

On May 07, 1997, the applicant filed a motion to reinstate voluntary departure. On June 6, 1997, the request for reinstatement of voluntary departure was denied. A warrant of deportation was issued on June 20, 1997. On July 9, 1997, the applicant filed a request for humanitarian parole or deferred action. This application was adjudicated on February 05, 1998, and a denial notice was issued to the applicant.

DISCUSSION: The applicant and his spouse were married on August 17, 1995, long after deportation proceedings were initiated in 1994. He knew, prior to getting married, that he was expected to leave the United States. Even though the applicant is the beneficiary of an approved visa petition, the outstanding warrant of deportation cannot be overlooked.

Mr. Botezatu's spouse stated her inability to return to her own country. It is noted she was granted asylum in the United States and the Service at no time has indicated that she must depart. While the applicant and his spouse may experience hardship if he is deported, no evidence has been submitted that the hardships would be anymore severe than those normally associated with the deportation of a family member.

DECISION: I have reviewed the applicant's request for a stay of deportation and his immigration history. After weighing all the facts available to me, I have determined as a matter of discretion to deny the applicant's request for a stay of deportation.

The application for a stay of deportation is denied.
